Assessing damages for funds management: When, why and how much?

When is it appropriate to award damages for funds management? This session looks at what it means to be incapable of managing one's affairs and explores the evolution of funds management as a head of damage, including claims involving people whose incapacity has not been caused by the negligent tortfeasor. The session will also deal with quantification of damages for funds management, the tension between the costs charged by private trustees and the public interest in keeping insurance premiums affordable, and the author's suggestion for reform.
